'The Neighborhood' moves into its 100th episode

Some people stay in their neighborhoods for a long time ... and as the show's 100th episode affirms, that's also true of those in television's "The Neighborhood."

Directed by star and executive producer Cedric the Entertainer, the CBS sitcom's milestone story airs Monday, April 10, as the series nears the end of its fifth season. While Calvin (Cedric) tries to find the perfect birthday gift for wife Tina (Tichina Arnold) – which he has failed miserably at doing the past – neighbor Gemma (Beth Behrs) tries to get Jerry O'Connell (appearing as himself) to donate tickets to his CBS show "The Talk," for a fundraiser where she's the principal and his children are students.

Max Greenfield, Shaun McKinney, Marcel Spears and Hank Greenspan also are regular cast members in "The Neighborhood," which already has been renewed for a sixth season. The show has endured through multiple changes of executive producers (including series creator Jim Reynolds), and Cedric acknowledges that reaching 100 episodes is "very rare in the business of television these days, so we don't take it for granted."

Though humor is the main suit of "The Neighborhood," the show gets topical reasonably frequently. "In order to really get to the show that we were intending to do," Cedric explains, "(we had to) show the contentious nature of what happens when people just assume somebody is different from you because of skin color, religion, background, whatever. We kind of live in a culture where, 'If somebody is different from me, I don't like them.'"

"It takes you back to the early Norman Lear shows ... 'All in the Family,' 'The Jeffersons.' That was very intentional in the way we wanted to approach the show, especially me."

However, Cedric notes that as the casting and the overall work process continued, that helped shaped what "The Neighborhood" has become: "We enjoyed each other. We laughed a lot. We got each other's sense of humor, and so it's harder to act that (tension) when you have this kind of natural connection."

Co-star Behrs agrees, reflecting, "There is a certain camaraderie here and a certain amount of fun. There's never a day where I wake up and I'm bummed to go to work. No matter what's happening in my personal life, I come here and I laugh all day long with these people."

The on-air result makes actor Greenfield wistful about the atmosphere the series promotes, since he notes, "I grew up in a neighborhood where we definitely knew our neighbors. You were able to walk around the town, and it felt like I had a lot more freedom back then. And now, I know none of my neighbors. And I care not to."

TV restaurants: Places you'll never eat at – but wish you could (maybe)

Anyone who has ever worked in a restaurant will tell you that there is more than enough material there to make a TV show.

And television has a long, proud history of doing just that, mining the eccentricities of diners and staff for laughs and the pressure of producing meals on demand for drama. Or just about any other scenario the writers can think up.

Some of these eateries can seem so real, a viewer can just about taste the meal coming on screen – or look so bad they're glad the place doesn't really exist. Like the following.

Monk's Cafe, "Seinfeld": Fittingly, the Manhattan coffee shop where Jerry, George, Elaine and Kramer (Jerry Seinfeld, Jason Alexander, Julia Louis-Dreyfus, Michael Richards) often gathered to discuss the minutia of their lives served as a frequent setting for this much-decorated "show about nothing." But food did come out of the kitchen, whether it was the soup with the rubber band in it or the takeout big salad that George bought for Elaine and didn't get credit for. But don't get Elaine started on the waitresses with a certain common trait there.

Double R Diner, "Twin Peaks": FBI Agent Cooper (Kyle MacLachlan) embraced the simpler smalltown life of the titular Washington burg in which David Lynch's hit early '90s supernatural mystery series was set, and he downed each slice of blueberry pie and "damn fine cup of coffee" he ordered at this eatery with gusto.

Vesuvio, "The Sopranos": Upscale Italian food was on the menu of this classy New Jersey establishment where Tony (James Gandolfini) and his goons often dined, and owner Artie (John Ventimiglia) always made sure they were taken care of – that is, until it met with an unfortunate "accident."

Bob's Burgers, "Bob's Burgers": If cartoon fast food served in a scenic animated oceanfront setting is your thing, this family-owned New Jersey concern might be for you. But the humor and wit here are very real, as exemplified by the "Burger of the Day," a running gag that gave comestibles clever names such as the "I've Created a Muenster Burger" and the "What's The Worcestershire That Could Happen Burger."

Luke's Diner, "Gilmore Girls": In addition to the food and drink served up at this establishment, diners here would often get a floor show, whether it was Luke (Scott Patterson) yelling at someone, swapping witticisms with Lorelei (Lauren Graham) or any one of dozens other scenarios. Life here was never dull.
